Make Bar Quality Cocktails At Home

BEGIN BY STIRRING THE IMAGINATION

Your Cocktail Kit is on its way, so let's just do one final check to make sure you're ready to stir and strain those Old Pal's to perfection.

YOU'LL NEED...

- Jigger - or any other mini measuring device from the kitchen
- Mixing glass - or a large tumbler or jar
- Bar spoon - or a utensil with a long handle
- Julep or Hawthorne strainer
- Coupette glass or other stemmed glass
- Plenty of ice to stir

"Simplicity is the keynote of all true elegance" ~ Coco Chanel

DID YOU KNOW?

The Old Pal is accredited to William "Sparrow" Robinson, a Parisian socialite from the late 1800s who called everyone "old pal". The drink was first published in 1922 by New York bartender Harry McElhone in 'Harry's ABC of Mixing Cocktails'.

The Assistive Multi-Armed Bandit (Lawrence Chan et al) (summarized by Asya):

Standard approaches for inverse reinforcement learning assume that humans are acting optimally according to their preferences, rather than learning about their preferences as time goes on. This paper tries to model the latter by introducing the assistive multi-armed bandit problem.

- A player better at learning does not necessarily lead to the player-robot team performing better-- the robot can help a suboptimal player do better in accordance with how much information the player's arm pulls convey about the reward of the arm.

- A robot is best at assisting when it has the right model for how the player is learning.

- A robot that models the player as learning generally does better than a robot that does not, even if the robot has the wrong model for the player's learning.

- The problem is very sensitive to which learning model the player uses and which learning model the robot assumes. Some player learning models can only be effectively assisted when they are correctly modeled. Some robot-assumed learning models effectively assist for a variety of actual player learning models.

OPINION

Asya's opinion: My impression is that this is a very impressive robotics result, largely because the problem of transferring training in simulation to real life ("sim2real") is extremely difficult. I also think it's quite novel if as the authors hypothesize, the system is exhibiting emergent meta-learning. It's worth noting that the hand is still not quite at human-level -- in the hardest configurations, it only succeeds 20% of the time, and for most experiments, the hand gets some of the state of the cube via Bluetooth sensors inside the cube, not just via vision.

NEWS

FHI DPhil Scholarships (summarized by Rohin): The Future of Humanity Institute will be awarding up to two DPhil scholarships for the 2020/21 academic year, open to students beginning a DPhil at the University of Oxford whose research aims to answer crucial questions for improving the long-term prospects of humanity. Applications will open around January or February, and decisions will be made in April.

Post-Doctoral Fellowship on Ethically Aligned Artificial Intelligence (summarized by Rohin) (H/T Daniel Dewey): Mila is looking for a postdoctoral fellow starting in Fall 2020 who would work on ethically aligned learning machines, towards building machines which can achieve specific goals while acting in a way consistent with human values and social norms. Applications are already being processed, and will continue to be processed until can achieve specific goals while acting in a way consistent with human values and social norms. How to Set Macros for a Ketogenic Diet

When learning how to set macros for a ketogenic diet, we must answer certain questions. How low is "low" carb and how high is "high" fat? Many of us haven't even heard of macros before! Don't worry though, they are easy enough to understand.
